Voters believe tent encampments are a humanitarian emergency requiring urgent action.

Tent encampments on Portland streets are a humanitarian emergency; the situation is getting worse and requires more urgent action from City and County elected officials.

Tent encampments are a complex and difficult societal problem that can’t be addressed quickly. City and County elected officials are on the right track and making steady progress.

A proposal for safe villages for people who are homeless has very broad and strong support.

Here is a specific proposal that has been made to try to provide shelter for Portlanders experiencing homelessness. This proposal would replace the unsafe, unsanitary tent camps currently located all around the city with 50 new safe, sanitary villages with housing for homeless residents. Villages would have laundry, food, drinking water, spaces for eating and meeting, and lockers to securely store belongings. People living at the villages would be offered an individualized needs assessment that could connect them with substance abuse treatment, mental health care, job training, and options for more permanent housing. People would be required to leave unsanctioned encampments in public spaces if a space in a safe village has been offered to them, but police would not be used to sweep the camps.

This could cost roughly $55 million initially and $30 million per year thereafter, paid for by dedicating existing tax dollars collected from the new regional homeless services tax and one-time federal COVID relief revenues – with no increase in taxes.
A proposal to hold accountable those responsible for violence downtown has very broad and strong support.

Some people have proposed a change in how local government and law enforcement approach demonstrations downtown. This approach has three main principles:

• Continuing to uphold protesters’ right to peacefully protest in favor of social and racial justice;
• Taking all possible steps to avoid confrontations between police and these peaceful protestors; and
• Increasing efforts to identify, isolate, arrest, and aggressively prosecute the small group of people who are using the protests as cover for property damage and violence.
